

Prayer for our dear disembodied

62. Introduction. We are everlasting beings. Those who light us up with friendship, affection and virtue are much more than a perishable matter merger. The loving thought of the one who cries for their disembodied loved being always seeks its addressee. Soul survives grave. Our dearest discarnate ones, such as mother, father, sibling or a beloved child, remain alive in other dimension. We should keep hope because separation is temporary. In God's appointed time, all of us will be allowed to meet again.

Carnal life is important and necessary. It offers us a learning opportunity that, if well used, leads us to a happier spiritual existence. The valuable lessons we learn during incarnation remain as an eternal life achievement.¹

63. Prayer. My God! Receive this prayer on behalf of the spirit of [person's name]. Allow it to better notice your light. Make it easy for it to learn new lessons for a happier future. Allow the good spirits to take my prayer to it. As for me, my God, prevent me from making wrong decisions that, in addition to causing pain, would delay very much my reunion with it.

And you, my dear! Feel my loving thought for you! Realize that my affection for you remains strong! God called you before me so that you could now reap the fruits you sowed on the Earth. Complaining about your departure would be selfish on my part, as I would be rebelling against the right you have of harvesting the fruits of your sowing. Thus, I resignedly await the moment of our reunion, according to the divine decision. I know our separation is momentary. No matter long it might seem, its duration vanishes before the eternity of the bliss God grants to those who learn to unconditionally love. Between us there is only a material veil that hides you from my vision! I know you can be right here, by my side, seeing and hearing me like before or even better. I remember you with great affection, be sure! May you be increasingly supported and strengthened, and may the God's love and peace be with you!

1 - See chapter 4, item 18; also chapter 5, item 21.